dem de demo is perhaps mr. amoda's most openly satirical work.

the work is done with metal funnels depicting women demonstrating against the price of kerosene. they are all carrying empty bowls just to show you the level of hardship they are going through. but paradoxically, these same women are the ones who could be very eager to welcome into their midst those very political and economic thieves who are responsible for their plight. the thieves would come, give a few soothing words and promises and then disappear. - okore ode [dr.]
